His passport doesn't matter, but his passing does! – The most important book on the football World Cup 2018

It's the 68th minute. His team are 2:1 behind. The stadium is erupting, and they're shouting his name. He stands at the edge of the pitch warming up. He's about to be subbed on. He has to turn this match around, and he's ready to give his all for his country. His kit is black and white, his skin is brown. But that doesn't matter. Because as soon as he sets foot on the pitch, he's just One in Eleven*.*

Manfred Theisen describes the stream of thought that racees through a footballer's mind in the few minutes before he is subbed on in an all-important game. And although it doesn't take much longer than that to read this short book, the text provides an answer to what is perhaps the most important and pressing question of
