What if you can remember everything – except for your feelings? That's the questions Norah asks herself after a serious car accident. Even though she remembers most of the moments in her life she can't recollect the feelings that connected her with them. Does she like reading? Does she love her boyfriend? Is her little sister as annoying?

The only feeling she remembers is for her old kindergarten friend Sam. But they haven't had contact in years since Norah turned popular in school and Sam didn't. While they grow closer again they make up a testing-list. And suddenly Norah has to ask herself: Was she really herself before the accident?
